PATRICIA ELAINE ALLEN

On all occasions Patsy is consistently kind, cheerful, courteous, and considerate. In fact, few students, if any, present a better portrait of the ideal student than does Patsy. Always doing her work in a very willing, cooperative, and creditable manner, she has proved herself an outstanding student. With grace and ease, combined with a natural and sincere smile, Patsy has endeared herself to both faculty and students.

Patsy has been a majorette for the past two years.

WANDERINGS OF A SPACEMAN

I dipt into the future far as human eye can see,
Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be

Tennyson

I left the Physiological Conditioning room an hour before dawn. The night had been warm and humid and now it was raining. The rain felt cool to my face and hands in contrast with the discomfort I felt from my pressure suit.

I stood outside the door of the Conditioning Center a moment looking into the sky. I had always been awed by its vastness and depth, and had never failed to be a bit apprehensive and excited before penetrating that depth. I always felt as a young boy does when he first receives his flying license —tense, but with a lightness in his stomach.

I entered the monorail conveyor that was to transport me to the launching station. The car rushed over the four hundred yards in a few seconds, and as I stepped out, the awesome dimensions of my ship loomed before me. Its metallic jacket glistened from the rain and the floodlights that were directed upon it. The nose would have been invisible, had it not been for the contrast that the sky, which had begun to lighten, provided. I felt a slight fear just looking at it. The ship was the zenith in intergalactic transports. Its photon power plant produced 150,000 degrees Kelvin temperature and supplied ample sectons to approach the speed of light, thus enabling trips to planets and galaxies thousands of light years away.

I stood watching the ship, feeding my excitement for several minutes, and then realized that I had to report to the briefing room. As I started into the briefing room, I heard someone call my name. Alton Doby came under a light, and I saw that it was he who was calling. Alton was in charge of the group preparing the power plant. He had showed a remarkable ineptness with engines and mechanics from an early age. It seems that he once constructed some sort of vehicle and met with disaster. He ran off the road into a field—no, a grove—ah, yes, Grove Theater, it was.

"The metal for vaporization has been inserted. Everything's ready," said he.

"Thank you. I'll leave in twenty minutes," I said, turning and stepping into the door of the building where the briefing room was.

I had to pass through an outer office in order to get to it. The room was a large one, but there were only two desks, one at either end. Sitting at the desks were Mary Ann Eberhardt and Faye Pruitt. They were both talking into dictaphones. (I later learned that they were talking to one another. The office general flunky and top wage earner, Kenneth Johnston, by wiring the phones into a two-way communication system, had defeated the purpose of the department head, Phil Harris, in separating them.)

I passed through the outer office and proceeded down a long corridor. At the end of the corridor was the briefing room. When I entered the room, the instructor had his back to me. I took a seat next to the only other occupant in the room.

The instructor turned to me and said, "I'm Mr. Hulsey, affectionately known as "Bill." He chuckled as if he had said something hilariously funny and said, "This is Steve Hester, your navigator."

I acknowledged the introduction—an absurdly foolish action as I had spoken to him as I entered.

The instructor continued, "Now if the formalities have been effected, we will proceed to utilize this room."

He spoke as a teacher of young children, who had been rude and needed reprimanding. I felt his attitude to be hardly appropriate.

Much to my abuse was the reply of Mr. Hester, "Quite right, sir."

Before the apparent coalition of the two against my self-respect had thoroughly registered on me, the instructor spoke again.

"On second thought, we'll dispense with this silly instruction. If you don't already know how to fly, you'll never survive this trip anyhow."

I rose and left immediately. Hester followed me out. We walked out toward the ship without speaking. As we came closer to the elevator that was to carry us up to our control compartment, I saw that the operator on duty was Arnold Marquardt.

We all spoke as we stepped onto the platform. I never failed to expect Marquardt to speak in French. His name sounded terribly "Frenchy." He spoke fluent English, however, as he demonstrated with a profusion of it as we ascended. (Neither Hester nor I had a chance to utter a single diphthong.) As we rose alongside the ship, I looked down. All the men, but one, had discontinued their work. Though he looked disproportioned by the height, I recognized that he was Jimmy Ritchey. He was checking everything in the electrical system. He was a thorough electronic engineer.

When we reached the control compartment, Marquardt opened the door and we stepped in. Our seats were before an instrument panel, cluttered with guages, meters, dials, levers, and a large television screen.

As we were strapping ourselves in, the scratchy voice of Bob Tutterow came over the speaker, "This is the tower. Prepare for count down."

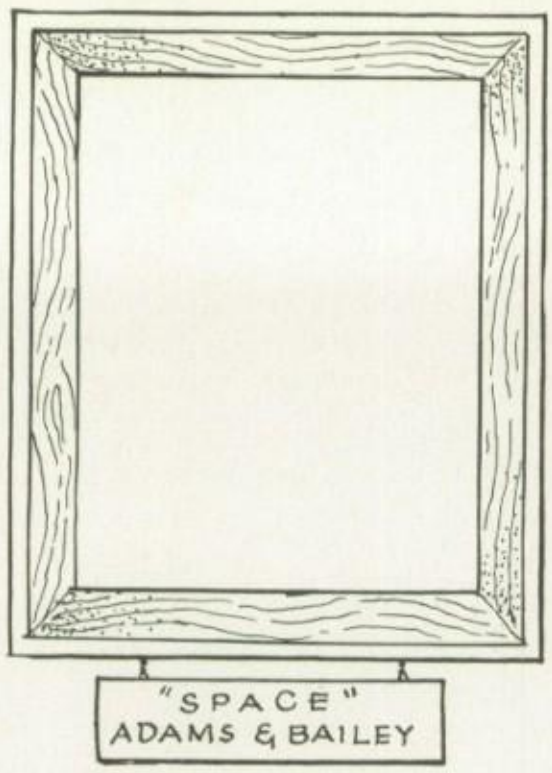
We finished strapping ourselves in and signaled the tower that we were ready.

The count down began: . . . six . . . five . . . four . . . three . . . two . . . one . . .

We heard only a clap and felt a crushing lunge.

We woke to a mild titillation, produced by a weak electric current that was installed for the purpose of awakening passengers.

Our instruments showed that we were approaching the speed of light, and we suffered from no malfunction in any department. We were unaware of motion. The ship glided through the rarified air, penetrating further and further into that infinite continuum. It was a strange and austere world outside the ship. Away from the sun, on the shaded side of the ship, were frigid temperatures far below zero. On the other side was a torrid and scorching deluge of direct sun rays, so that if a person should stand outside, he would be frostbitten on one side and severly burned on the other. Speed was only detectable by our Doppler screen. The light from the stars changed colors as we increased in speed, due to somewhat of a compression of their waves. We left the atmosphere of the earth far behind and the ship reached for unimaginable distances. Time slowed down . . . almost stopping.



Jupiter, as opposed to the old idea, was the smallest planet in our solar system. What had been taken for its surface was nothing more than a layer of clouds and other light particles that had not fallen to the planet. It was in a similar state that our planet had gone through. This information I obtained from the learned astrophysicists Harold Harmon and Lester Duckett.

Jupiter, in recent years, had become the center of culture in our known parts of the universe. It had the gay, lighthearted atmosphere of Montmartre in the ancient city of Paris—art studios, theatres, sidewalk cafes, and basement restaurants—and the erudite atmosphere of the intellectual circles of the Germans.

The art studios of Nancy Adams and Patti Bailey had gained world renown. The artists had distinguished themselves with their creation of a new conception in painting. Their profound creations were called paintings of "infinite nothingness." The canvasses appeared to be blank, but that was only their ostentatious appearance. They were filled with rich, flowing themes of "nothing." They had attained the ultimate in abstraction.

The landing on Mars was highly successful. Mars was to be the starting point for a study I was to make before starting my novel, Scared Old World. Hester was dismissed until the next flight. The planet looked interesting and I took up my task with alacrity.

The first city I visited was Betenbaughville, named after its founder, Cecil Betenbaugh. It was a pleasant city with streams of mercury running down gently-flowing hills of plutonium storehouses, covered with dirt and made into mounds that approached the size of mountains.

The mayor of the town was Willie Aultman. The city was divided into several precincts, each with its aultman,—ah, alderman. There was a conflict between the mayor and the aldermen about the price of oxygen for breathing. The aldermen had had a meeting with the mayor's Staff of Secretaries, which was made up of Diane Pilgrim, Joyce Wright, Janice Austin, Jeri Ann Lanford, and Janice Federico. The aldermen, Shelby Sutton, Ronnie Haygood, Lynwood Massey, and Ronnie Hughes and the staff closed their meeting by adopting a resolution which stated: "We, the aldermanic board, in conjunction with the mayor's Staff of Secretaries, hereby declare that we shall always hold the opinion that the Earth moon is more romantic from this side."

I left the Civic Center; I wanted to meander about the city and study its individuals. In my conversations I learned of one person, James Davis, who walked about with a leash as if a dog was attached to it, and he habitully uttered affectionate words (as one does to dogs) as he strolled along. I approached him and inquired on the matter. He replied:

"Lies—false, malicious, deleterious, slandering, caustic lies. Besides, it's a cat," he said as he leaned over and picked up his chimerical feline and caressed it fondly.

I departed for Jupiter immediately.

There were always intellectual discussions and public forums in some part of the city. I attended one. The group was discussing the "Feasibility of Finding Further Facts For Fomenting Friendships For Flowery Females." Billy Burger, Editor of the Jupiternian Sun, weekly newspaper; Karen Caswell, secretary of the Judy Kay Bartlett Bureau of Better Beauties; Brenda Bryant, trigonometric genius; Wayne Allen, noted anthropologist, who once thought he had discovered the missing link, until Travis Hames came up with his ancestral tree; and Harriet Lee, local school superintendent, were the members of the panel. I left after Terrell Bearden and his rescue squad was called in to untie everyone's tongue.

I walked out with Richard Womack. He told me that he was an oil painter and that some of his works were on exhibition nearby. We walked to the gallery, which was just down the street. On display there were the sculptures of Marilyn Norton and Joan Putnam, mosaics of Ellen Holder and Martha Ann Holley, and the ceramics of Myrna Thomas and Sue Wages.

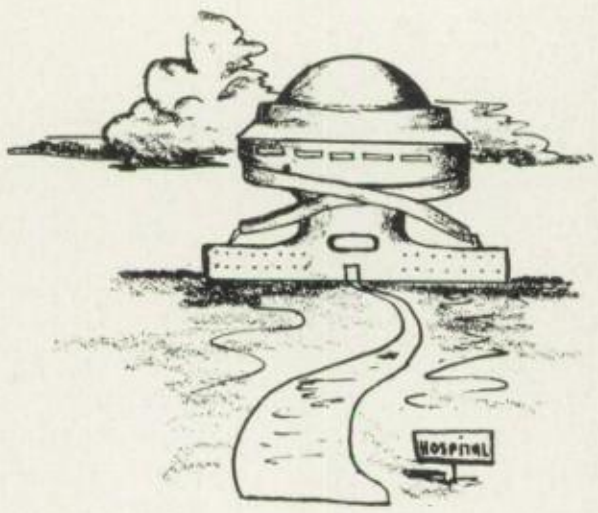
Next door to the gallery were the display rooms of the fashion designers, Betty Sue Horton, Faye Thackston, and June Sailors. Their creations set the vogue on the periphery of the solar system.

Because of the incasement of the canopy of clouds, the climate of Jupiter was tropical. Walking around the city had drained me of energy, and as I was leaving the studios I noticed a reducing salon where I supposed one could get a cold bath and a rub down. The owner of the salon was Richard Cash whose remedy for obese Jupiternians was hardly more than laborious work. The owner and his assistants, Marvin Williams and Richard Cole, always told their customers about one person who had lost twenty-five pounds in one day. Kenneth Holder had exercised strenuously all day with weights, and when he stepped upon the scales, he registered forty pounds more than when he had started. (He had been so anxious to see how much he had lost that he unknowingly stepped upon the scales with twenty pound weights in each hand.) His weight loss was attributed to shock.

Evening was falling as I left the salon. The light of the sun shining through the canopy was so diffused that there were no sharp outlines and shadows as on the earth, but everything was pervaded equally with a rose-colored hue until a Stygian darkness slowly took its place.

I went to my hotel, and before retiring, ate, and watched a show. The performer was Clyde Eberhardt. He sang, played the saxophone, piano, clarinet, and guitar all at the same time (well, almost—as he went from one to the other so quickly that he seemed to be playing them at one time.) He was very talented. He was, in his youth, (to use a hackneyed joke) a "band aid," assistant to a band instructor in school.

I learned that there were several widely-known entertainers staying at the hotel. George Cloud, drummer, Bobby "Satch" Hester, and Betty Lou Lacy, clarinetist, had formed an ensemble that featured some sort of ancient music that they called "Jazz"; these were to perform at the hotel the following night. Anna Marie Specht, the gifted soprano, was also at the hotel.



A trip to one of the hospitals in the city had been planned for me. I got an early start.

I asked the receptionist, Frieda Bell, at the information desk in the lobby of the hotel to tell me where I could find Dr. Ronnie West. Upon receiving the information, I started down a spotless corridor until I came to the room where Miss Bell had told me to go. I opened the door and found myself in an amphitheatre. Dr. West was standing below me with all the students that were studying under him. He was concluding his lecture:

"Now then, are there any questions?"

A pretty co-ed, Linda Dolan, raised her hand and asked, "What should be done if a patient develops an allergy for oxygen in his alveoli?"

"Have him transferred to another hospital immediately."

Janice Niver, Sarah Coleman, Jane Ellington, Gary Cooper, William Everidge, Diane Davis, and Jo Ann Armstrong, had been working on a project and had come up with a problem. They had been doing psychological studies on Sharon Pike and had been sending electrical impulses to her hypothalamus. The impulses had disrupted the regular mechanisms in the body and Sharon slept with her eyes open and walked about with them closed; she developed chill bumps in heated rooms, and went about exclaiming that the three sides of a triangle didn't equal 180 degrees. They expressed their problem to Dr. West, who was an avid reader of mathematical books.

He replied, "I suggest that first you read a book on Riemanian Geometry and then . . . uh, have her transferred to another hospital."

After the lecture and questioning, I walked down to see Dr. West. He was to carry me around the hospital and point out things of interest. He carried me to a laboratory. The room was rather large and there were at least twenty people in it. He introduced me to some of them and explained what they were working on. Jean Chastain, Jerry Boleman, Marilyn Boyd, Jean Painter, Nancy Williams, and Trudy Broome, were working on a new perfume which they called: "Noon in Bellwood." Another group was working on a synthetic food, made from sawdust. Phillip Hulsey had contrived the idea: Harry Winters was doing the experiments; Billy Brackett was the taster; Ju Don Baldwin was the laboratory technician who did tests on Brackett to find his reactions; and Martha Braswell developed recipes from the synthetic food. Some of her concoctions were:

Sawdust-stuffed Chicken
Jello and sawdust
Sawdust under glass
Shredded wood (breakfast cereal)
Whole Wood Bread

All of these appetizing delicacies could be prepared with a wide variety of flavors.

At the back of the room was another group, the largest. They were thrashing out a problem by debate. The problem at hand was that of what emergency actions could be taken if the Speaker of the House in Congress should develop acute leprosy of the larynx. The members of the discussion, Patsy Allen, James Haygood, and Ronnie Bell, were bitterly opposed to the suggestion by their supervisor, Frank Pitts, for replacing the malignant larynx with a woman's.

After seeing the rest of the hospital, I went to lunch. The restaurant where I ate was "Hobbs' Hoedown." A singing group, known as the "Pterodactyls" . . . or something similar to that, had been hired by Jerry Hobbs and were singing as I entered. Jerry Castleberry, Joe Whitehead, and two others, whom I can't remember, were singing "You Give Me Suspended Animation, Baby." After eating, I rose and started for the door, but I saw Wayne Costley sitting at a table with Jimmy Levy and Frankie Hall, and went over and spoke to them. As I again attempted to leave, my right foot, somehow, found contact with Costley's foot, and I careened off across the floor, stumbling, grabbing at tables, bumping into waiters, spilling trays, prostrating an old gentleman and his wife, and eventually coming to an abrupt stop beneath a table. I struggled to my feet; there was an imposing silence throughout the restaurant. Blushing and feeling very ashamed for my oafishness, I turned my head down and started out quickly. I ran into a post, head-first. Laughter rang out. Everyone was convulsed. With an indignant frown on my face I stood and gave all a threatening stare. Once again they all became silent. Then, I turned, with an air, and left. As I stepped onto the sidewalk I heard a spontaneous peal of laughter from within.

At the end of the street was the library. I thought that that would be a good place to mend my wounded ego.

The library was devoted to French writers,—Guy De Maupassant, Honore De Balzac, Gustave Flaubert, Alphonse Daudet. The librarian, Ann Stewart said, "Frenchmen are so wonderful." She permitted no books of any other nationality. Her assistants, Janice Tapley, Janice Camp, and Claudia Cannon, were guilty of reading Dostoevsky, and Tolstoi, however. Such reading had to be done in secret, of course, or Ann would report them to Glenda Robinson, reformist, woman suffrage leader, and the most influential lady in the Ladies' Discriminant Order of Selectified Lassies.

I spent an hour in the library. I left, not only because I was ready to go, but because I was asked to leave by the librarian after she asked me who my favorite writer was and I replied that he wasn't a Frenchman.

Desiring some diversion, I took a helicopter and went to the sports arena. The city had been reviving the game of football. No original equipment could be found, so the players were wearing space helmets and magnetic shoes.

The first thing that attracted my eyes as I came through the gate was one player hanging head-down from the goal post. His feet had attracted the metal of the post. It was Pat McCallum.

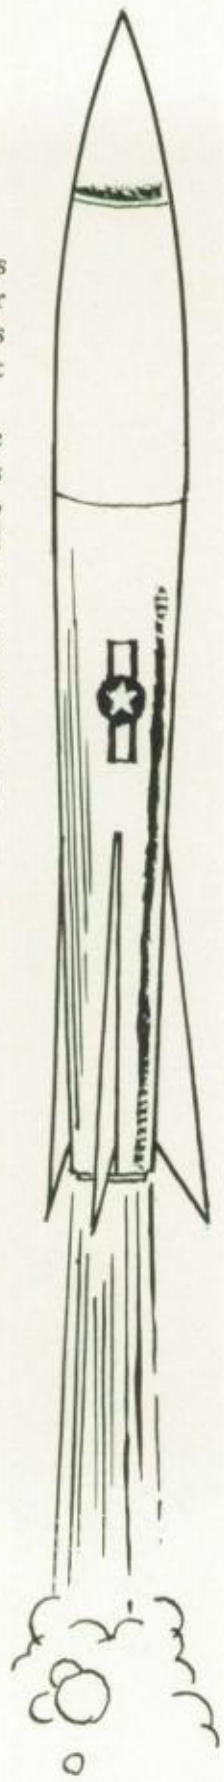
The game had begun, and there was quite a bit of commotion on the field. It seems that Equen Smith was filing a complaint to the referee, Gerald McCravy. He claimed that Joe Maxwell had disconnected his oxygen supply tube during a tackle. Billy Burdett came up to the referee and said that Smith had caught his tube on the antenna of Roy Burdett's helmet. The argument was then settled and the game resumed, but not for long, for shortly thereafter, Elizabeth Echols ran on the field and tackled one of the opposition, and enabled the home team to score. Because the sports commissioner, Gene Boggs, couldn't remember any rules that applied to such a situation, the game was called a tie. The home team spectators thought that they had won because they were so busy waving pennants and shouting.

As I was leaving, the clamor, the stentorian eulogies to the heroes, and the general cacophony roared on. Walking out with me were Julian Ransom, Paul Bowling, Larry Harris, Max Pruitt, Larry Boatright, Louie Williams, Ralph Thompson, and Larry Tumlin. They were complaining about the game being so short, and muttered something about six years

By the next morning I felt my visitation to Jupiter had been long enough, so I departed for Saturn. There was one place on Saturn that I wanted to visit. It was a colony of women. The colony had been established to see if women could even rule themselves. The colony was highly organized, theoretically.

I journeyed overland for a day before reaching the colony. I could have flown, but I wanted to observe the terrain. My guides, Everett Southern, and Dan King, and my companion for the visit, Tommy Hill, made the journey very informative through their thorough knowledge of the planet.

When we walked into the village, we were quite startled. In the midst of the village square was evidently the burning effigy of some woman. The women had set up barricades with flour bags and were throwing biscuits at one another. The whole village seemed to be in turmoil. The president, Dianne Ivie, had issued an ultimatum that all the women were to wear the fashions designed by Peggy Higgins. The village revolted violently. Tongues were wagging, feet were trodding, telephones were ringing, and biscuits were flying. The leaders in the revolution were Gay Nell Richardson, Charlotte Parks, Wanda Morgan, Marilyn Hefner, Barbara Hodgins, and Betty Jo Townsend. The advocates of the Ivie Party had solicited the mercenary services of the notorious tongue-waggers, Pat Goldston, Suellen Martin, Charlotte Mitchell, Helen Human, and Mary Lee Redd.



The devastating war raged on and on. There were summit meetings, cease-fire meetings, truce meetings, gossip meetings, and bridge meetings. Finally a committee composed of Marie Pittard, Doris Smith, Pat Argo, Jean Ashcraft, Margene Sinard, and their chairwoman, Peggy Morrison, sent a communique to the president that expressed their "anticipation of the proclamation of a Declaration of Emancipation," for the women folk of Peaceful Paradise, (the name of the colony.)

The president called a special session of her cabinet, Patsy Bearden, Pat Cowan, Joyce Blaylock, Diane Davis, LaNell Coker, Carolyn Brown, and Clara Carson.

The minutes of the meeting read something like this:

Date: July 4, 1974

Meeting: Special Session of the President's Cabinet

The President of Peaceful Paradise called a meeting of her cabinet, resulting from a communique from the rebel forces. The communique demanded immediate action by the President in retracting the ultimatum requiring uniform obeisance to designated fashions. Failure to comply with said demands will result in total annihilation of the President and her forces.

The President after recapitulating on the animosity and antagonism that had arisen as a result of her plan for fashion control, proposed a renunciation of the ultimatum with one stipulation: All women, no matter what their political preferences, must wear chartreuse hair.

Peace (using somewhat of a warped meaning of the word) settled on the fair village of Peaceful Paradise. The continuous gossiping and calumniating continued. The major problems, of whom to ostracize next week and whom to accept, were taken up again.

The ship glided on and on as if it was being pulled through the boundless universe by some great magnetic field. We passed on through our solar system, and floated for days and weeks through a cosmic sea, passing meteors, asteroids, and planets, and being awed by the brilliant blazes of comets, whose streaming tails were strung along our path for hundreds of thousands of miles. We moved from our galaxy into a great void and into another galaxy.

We chose a planet and landed. It was a barren and eerie land of purple shadows, arrid deserts and towering peaks, which were outlined by a somber grey sky that glowed with a pale red aurora along its horizon.

We had hardly any expectation of finding life on the planet, and even less so after we realized that it was necessary to wear oxygen helmets. Before we would leave, however, we intended to survey the land thoroughly.

Hester, — who was still navigating, and I started on a trek across the desert on which we landed. Before we had completed our walk, we saw a bright glow coming from what appeared to be a giant crater, similar to those on the Earth-moon. We approached the crater edge cautiously. We were startled beyond description. Just below the surface level, a great glass bubble covered the whole opening of the crater, which was at least a hundred yards across. Through the glass, we saw below us a tropical paradise beyond all imagination. It was decked with a luxuriant robe of vegetation, giant ferns, cocoanut trees, and variegated tropical flowers.

After overcoming our amazement, we finally realized that the thing to do was to find access into the glass-enclosed world. We started walking around the edge, and came upon a glass door that opened automatically, but due to some movement we made, it seemed. We passed through the door and sat down in an escalator-like conveyor that quickly deposited us on the floor of the sphere. We were further amazed. We learned that the circumference of the crater opening wasn't the limitation of the world below. The trees and flowers stretched as far as we could see up under the ground. This part was lighted by an incandescent material that lined the ceiling.

Assuming that we could remove our helmets, we did so. The air was sweet and invigorating. We decided to sit down and rest before exploring. While sitting there, we saw an object moving through the bush. It was a man. He stepped out into a clearing and came toward us. He greeted us cordially and introduced himself as Ronnie Lumpkin. When we inquired about the strange surroundings, he replied:

"All my life I've wanted to be a beachcomber. By the time I was old enough to realize my desire, there were no far away isles to go to. Everything had become so civilized and cultivated that I decided I would have to go to another galaxy to find an ideal place for beachcombing. I finally decided upon this planet. As you saw above, the place was quite lifeless and barren; so I went back to the earth and searched out four others who had similar desires to mine. After extensive searching, I came up with four: Hugh O'Kelley, Murray Evans, Charles Martin, and Bill Stone. I explained to them the situation." He made a sweeping gesture and continued, "All this you see now had to be made. I stayed on Earth another year. We all were studying different phases of science, preparing ourselves for our task. We studied zoology, botany, nuclear physics, electronic engineering, irrigation, agriculture, and air conditioning, under the tutorship of Billy Ashcraft and Marianne Blume.

"With our period of study finished, we came here, and this is the result. Come, I must show you our beach."

He led us off through the dense bush, and we emerged on the shore of a beautiful lake with a dazzling white beach. Lying at the edge of the water was Bill Stone, so that the water lazily rolled up to his waist and slid away. Lying in a hammock, sleeping, close by, was Murray Evans. Hugh O'Kelley could be seen on the far side of the beach with fishing pole in hand, napping. Charles Martin was sleeping, babyishly, in his thatch hut.

Ronnie, noticing me smiling at the lethargy that had gripped everyone, said, "There was an awful lot of work involved." We all laughed heartily, for the atmosphere of the place was conducive to joviality and pleasure.

We imbided the richness of the restful resort for a fortnight. Before leaving, we promised that we wouldn't tell of our find—the influx of vacationers would be disastrous.

At the top of the crater, we looked back for one last look and waved good-by. We boarded the ship and precipitated ourselves into the empty and cold space once more. I felt that I had enough information and experience to begin my book now, so we headed back to Earth.

We disembarked at midday. I said good-by to Hester and congratulated him for his excellent navigation. I stretched myself and felt a satisfaction in being back on earth.

The launching station wasn't busy at the moment, and I looked in the outer office of the briefing room just out of curiosity. The secretaries had been replaced by Beverly Hawks and Charlene Williams. Kenneth Johnston had accidentally wired Harris' dictaphone to theirs, and he learned a few bad things about himself that he hadn't known before. Two others, Frances Livingston and Peggy Jo Mullins were added also.

After going through the processes at the Conditioning Center, I went to my apartment and slept till the middle of the next day. I felt completely rested and hungry when I woke. I went to the Two Sisters Restaurant to eat. The restaurant was reputed to serve the finest food in the western hemisphere. The two sisters, Dora and Sarah Dutton, prepared the food themselves, although it was rumored that Grady Wallace, mayor, prepared the recipes to drum up tourist attention to his city.

I went to a movie in the evening. Starring in the production were Deloris Mashburn; Jerry Thompson, as Jungle Jerry; and Angeline Brown. The name of the movie was The Dark Ages, Part II—from September 1, 1947-May 28, 1959. It was written by Dick Stewart and Dennis Kelley.

I hailed a taxicopter and went home. The taxi was piloted jointly by Russell Newsome and Phil Futrelle. I was ready to begin my book, to bring to fruition the goal of my life's work. I worked far into the night . . .

I took off an hour before dawn. All my life I'd wanted to be a beachcomber, and besides, who would read any silly book that I should ever write?

I dipped into the future as far as I could see,
Depicted a future cosmos as it
appeared to me,
SPRATLING

The West Fulton Owls opened the 1958 season with a stirring defensive battle against Bass High. The Owls were upset, however, 6 to 0. The next week saw the Owls score touchdowns in the closing moments of the first and second halves to beat Fulton High 19 to 0 while playing heads-up football. The Smith High eleven fell the next week, 13 to 0. Starting into the sub-region games as underdogs to the Golden Bears of Sylvan, West Fulton outplayed them; but a lucky break for the Bears gave Sylvan a touchdown late in the game, causing a 7 to 7 tie. Homecoming was celebrated against Southwest, the Owls giving the Wolves a 19 to 0 thumping. The Owls left the region battles for a week and put up a top-grade fight before falling to Eastern contender Murphy 20 to 12. Suffering from costly injuries, the Owls fought hard in their last three games but were defeated. Region Champion Brown hit the Owls 32 to 6. The Irish of O'Keefe poured it on the next week to the tune of 41 to 7. In the finale the Owls played Northside to an early tie in the first two quarters, but Northside bounced back to win 46 to 7.

RIFLE TEAM

First row: Rivers, Folds, Dangar. Second row: Hester, Adams, Burton.

The West Fulton Rifle Team went through their first five of ten matches winning three and losing two. This puts West Fulton in second place in the Western Division, and indications point toward a high finish in the second round of competition.

The Rifle Team also fires in other events such as the Hearst Trophy Matches.

Team Captain is Stacey Dangar, who, at this writing, leads all city firers with a 182 average.

Sergeant Misiak is Team Coach.

HIGHLIGHTS

The First Battle Group, West Fulton Regiment, has had for the past few years one of the best units in the entire City Corps of Cadets.

Captain Melvin D. Schiller is the Assistant Professor of Military Science and Tactics at West Fulton while Sergeant First Class Warren M. Snodgrass is the NCO-in-charge. Sergeant First Class Frank P. Misiak is next in command.

Many varied activities take place within the military department during the school year. After six weeks of tryouts at the beginning of the year, the cadet officers for the year are presented their rank and sabers on Saber Day in an impressive ceremony.

The cadet officers were this year given the chance to attend a demonstration of firepower at Fort Benning, Georgia; many took advantage of this opportunity and spent an enjoyable day as guests of the United States Army.

The Battle Group Commander, Cecil Betenbaugh, and the West Fulton Color Guard took part in a ceremony reactivating the 12th Corps.

Other noteworthy events of the year included the participation in the annual Veteran's Day Parade; the cadets also took an active part in the Empty Stocking Fund Drive at Christmas time.

The annual Federal Inspection takes place in April and is soon followed by Drill Competition within the city. Since West Fulton won sub-region titles in both the Platoon and Company Divisions in 1958, the outlook for future titles is bright.

The presentation of awards at the annual ROTC Night ceremonies in May marks the end of the ROTC year.

Colonel Betenbaugh receives his saber and takes command of the Battle Group.

Mr. Thompson grimly eyed the class as he prepared to return a batch of trig papers. "You will remain seated while they are passed out," he commanded. "If you were to stand, it is conceivable you might accidentally form a circle—which would make me liable for arrest."

"Why?" chorused Equen Smith and George Cloud, nibbling at the bait.

"For maintaining a dope ring."
